the way through the second part of 2010. Good thing we had a favourable entry, since the exit turned out to be quite difficult. In a single large move down, the price powered far through our theoretical stop, and we gave back far more money than intended. This is always a risk with trend models operating on daily data, but one which tends to be worth it in the long run.

After barely dodging the bullet, being saved by the rates sector, we end the year with a tiny bit of profit, not even 3% (Tables 6.39 and 6.40). A very volatile year, plenty of ups and downs, and nothing to show for us. But we do have something to cheer for this year, a reason why you probably won't
