Global bank

Several organizations, including the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, control financial transactions around the world. They lend funds to developing countries but these will have conditions attached.

PEGGING CURRENCIES

In the Depression of the 1930s, many countries devalued their currencies to promote exports. This shrank the market and prolonged the slump. To stop this, world leaders met in 1944 and agreed to peg currencies against (maintain a set exchange rate with) the US dollar. They set up the International Monetary Fund (IMF) for emergency funding and the World Bank to lend money for long-term development.
