actually made a component of the product about which they rhapsodize will be much more convincing and successful in their sales campaigns.

The employee-relations expert will have a much clearer and better understanding of employee problems and psychology if he spends more time among the employees and less in his paneled office dreaming up new "morale-building" gimmicks or bowling parties.

I don't suppose there are any finer examples to prove my point than the companies in the Bell Telephone System.

There are few Bell System companies in which the top executives didn't work their way up through the ranks.

They began as linemen, cable-splicers, bookkeepers. They generally moved around as well as up during their careers.

They run their operations with remarkable efficiency.

Walter Munford, the late president of U.S. Steel, began his career as a die-reamer, working 78 hours per week—and came up the hard way. Harry B. Cunningham, president of S. S. Kresge, started as a stock boy and worked his way up through the various departments and levels of the giant retail chain. The list of such examples could be extended indefinitely, but the point, I think, is clear.

Another error that unseasoned businessmen make is that they relegate, rather than delegate, authority. I suppose it's natural for an executive or a man who owns a business to feel that he should take things as easily as possible. That's human nature—but it's hardly good business. A businessman can never afford to let down—nor can he afford to relegate his authority. If he allows others to run his business without maintaining close and constant supervision over their policies and operations, he's most
