It's awfully easy to look at your income and argue that life would be easier if you just made a little bit more. And it might…for a single moment. But have you ever heard of Parkinson's Law[1]? In technical terms, this principle says that work expands to fill the time available for its completion. In more basic language, it means the time spent is equal to what you have.

When we apply Parkinson's Law in a financial sense, we see that higher income often leads to higher expenses. Not because we intentionally set out to spend more, instead the extra money in our pocket gives us a false sense of security and more of a reason not to care. Why hold back when you have enough to afford it anyway?

But truthfully, more income doesn't solve the underlying issue. The idea of more means we're not content with what we have, and we don't believe that it's quite enough. When in reality, we already have everything we could possibly need. We just need to learn how to handle it in a completely different way.

So here's a question for you—instead of viewing your expenses as a frustration, what if you used them as motivation to manage what you already have, even better?

Just think of the savings potential! So much of our money washes away because we secretly believe the price of goods and services we pay for is unchangeable. When in reality, we've had the power all along to make this change ourselves. It starts with plugging up those tiny cracks—our monthly expenses—that if left unattended, can turn into some pretty big leaks.

IF YOU'VE ALREADY SACRIFICED SO MUCH

For some of you, your budget is already stretched as far as it can go, and you struggle with not knowing what else to cut. How do you manage your money when there's not much of it to manage in the first place? This is an incredibly hard place to be—trust me, I know! I've experienced my fair share of really hard times over the years, and it's overwhelming, stressful, and frustrating to say the least.
