sonal funds, however, any individual can give his business judgment and initiative free reign.

If the speculator detects evidences of incompetent management in a given corporation . . . he can give silent evidence of his disapproval by selling the corporation's securities . . .

Men, Materials, Money

What does the manager of a business do? He controls men, materials and money, seeking to handle them in such a way that the business will produce a profit. If the business is to be more than a fleeting success, he must in so doing render some real public service either in transforming the materials into a form more useful to the ultimate consumer or in rendering them more readily available. Conceiving the speculator as manager of a business it will be seen that he also controls men, materials and money. The money is the starting point of his business, the materials are the securities which he buys and sells, the men are the directors and managers of the companies in whose securities he invests. His materials are not, to be sure, transformed in his hands, but his very activities in buying and selling tend to make them more or less readily available to the conservative investor. In the same way he exerts an indirect influence over the men who serve him. The compensation and the tenure of office of the directors and executives of even the largest corporations depend in the long run upon the satisfaction that their services give to the intelligent speculators and investors interested in their securities. If the speculator detects evidences
