you have money set aside to fit your living situation to your changing lifestyle. Being self-sufficient for as long as possible will stretch your savings.

7. What other income or subsidies are you eligible for? Do your research and find out what your insurance policy covers, what benefits you're eligible for—such as disability, housing, or funeral costs—or if you can collect your spouse's pension if he or she has passed away.

8. Are you willing to move? You might have to relocate to be closer to family as you need more and more of their help. Be open to that. Or, if finding housing in a cheaper city or country is possible, consider that as well.

9. Are your papers in order? Check your will, make any last-minute changes, and make sure you've assigned an executor you trust. Consult an estate-planning lawyer if need be. Also, are there safety deposit boxes or other accounts that you haven't mentioned?

10. What do you want your financial legacy to be? Do you have a trust? Who will have power of attorney if you are incapacitated? What are your wishes in that case?

Remember, you're going to have to answer every one of these questions at some point. And if you're the adult child of middle-aged parents, consider having these conversations now, when your folks are still lucid and well enough to have agency over their own decisions. Never lose sight of the fact that it's their money. You're just the shepherd. Give advice if you see fit, but don't expect anyone to take it.
