duration.

As mentioned earlier, typically life insurance should be purchased with the intent of a secure future for the family and never with the intent of high returns on the invested amount. In case your goal of buying life insurance is to put some money aside for investment, there are far better ways to do so without having to pay such high commissions to the insurance company.

There is only one kind of life insurance that makes sense for the vast majority of us and that is term life insurance policy. This typically takes the minimum insurance premium to provide maximum security but does not give you any returns. My wife has been a registered insurance provider with one of the leading life insurance provider companies and we know the 'ins and outs' of the types of insurance policies. Term Insurance is the best "value for money" as far as financial security is concerned.

With a whole life or a universal policy, on the other hand, the insurance company knows that it will almost certainly have to pay the face amount or the death benefit (and you are expected to die with it.) , and so, they price it accordingly.

If you have multiple existing insurance policies, you may want to terminate a few and increase your term cover so that not only are you more secure financially, but are also paying fewer premiums. The money saved thus, should be invested in better investment instruments as discussed in this book.

Every insurance company has a term insurance plan and this is what I would advise all of you to go ahead with.
