3. Do you have an independent investment advisor managing only your portfolio, separate from your partner's? Y/N

4. Are your family assets purchased under a joint ownership? This includes your house, vacation properties, boats, recreational vehicles and any equipment or property you own for the family business. Y/N

5. If your spouse runs a family business, is he or she valuating your contribution? (I mean that quite literally—you should be making a percentage of every dollar your spouse makes in the business, and if you contribute equally, that percentage should be equal, too. Even if you've been a homemaker for the past 30 years, you've been making a huge contribution to the family dynasty, and you deserve to be paid for it.) Y/N

If you answered yes to most of these questions, hats off to you. You are achieving financial independence. But don't get complacent: I encourage you to continue to seek diversification in your portfolio and work alongside your partner to keep building your financial dynasty.

If you've answered a mix of yes and no, you've got some work to do when it comes to protecting your financial future. As of right now, your financial independence is not secure. If you have your own investment advisor, schedule a review to see what could be improved. If you don't have your own advisor, hire one.

If you answered mostly no to these questions, you may be heading into a financial catastrophe. The good news: it's not too late to avert it. Set up an appointment today with a financial advisor and investigate the options that are available to you.
