multiple accounts with different banks is how a Relator puts on their own financial oxygen mask first.

Bank accounts that are important for Relators include an everyday account, a savings account, a bills account, a buffer (or 'oh f*ck') account and a fun account. Having a fun account that is just for them can be incredibly important—that way they're not simply looking after everyone else but they're also spending on themselves. Having a buffer account is just as much for their children's car repairs as it will be for their own car repairs, because they're motivated to rescue. But it means they're not dipping into their savings. Like the Creator Money Types, Relators should ensure their buffer account isn't with the same bank as their everyday account.

I've toyed with the idea of having a 'giving back' account with Relators; while it can work for some, I've found that Relators can feel guilty if a large percentage of their income isn't going to this account. It can be a great way to establish a fixed portion of their income that will go towards causes but for most Relators it will involve giving out of their everyday account and adopting their own spending habits to suit.

Advanced Habits

Whether it's by nature or nurture, the Relator is hardwired to help others. That's one of their greatest strengths, but it can also be their greatest weakness if they do this to the depletion of themselves. Relators have a tendency to put themselves last and to rescue those around them, which is why it's important for Relators to create their own financial safety net or put on their own financial oxygen mask first.

One financial habit that is incredibly important for Relators is to hide your long-term savings in something other than cash. Put it onto your mortgage rather than in your offset account and ignore or reduce your redraw amount. (This is very different to the advice I give other Money Types.) Or put it into superannuation where you can't access it (depending of course on your age and your goals) or put it into shares, an index fund or a managed fund if you're less likely to dip into it there. It's about saving
