Let’s ROCK!

Step 1: Check yourself before you wreck yourself

Call your HR department (or just call your boss at lunchtime, when they’re not busy).

Say this:

‘Hello, I’d like to know if you allow me to choose my own super fund.’

Some workplaces allow it, others don’t (because of workplace agreements), and the only way to know is to ask the question.

If you think this phone call is slightly awkward, don’t worry. I guarantee the person on the other end of the line is thinking to themselves: ‘Golly, I wish I’d been that smart when I was a kid.’

Whether you’re allowed to choose your own super or not, you’ve just gone WAY UP in their estimations. You, my friend, are killing it.

Step 2: Your 15 minutes of fame (and fortune)

So, you’re going to be told one of two things: you can’t switch, or you can. Here’s what to do either way.

If you can’t switch super funds . . .

Bummer—for the time being, you’re stuck in your employer’s ‘default’ super fund.

Thankfully, all super funds (including yours) will offer a range of investment options.

It’s like standing in front of the menu board at Macca’s. There are a dozen things you could choose to eat—a McFlurry, a Quarter Pounder, McNuggets.

People who just accept the ‘default’ option aren’t even making a choice . . . they’re just sitting there with their mouths open, hoping someone will throw
