THE WORKER

Basic Habits

The problem for Workers is they may not get around to figuring out what bank accounts work best for them, so at a minimum I would suggest a prescriptive approach to the basic accounts: a bills account, a savings account and an everyday account that have payments automated between them. But I do think it's important that some Workers also use a fun account and make sure that each month or quarter they spend the fun account monies so they're enjoying the fruits of their hard work. This also helps curb a weakness of the Worker, which is unconscious spending because they haven't kept lists or don't have time. Keeping a fun account allows for guilt-free 'overspending' within allowed-for limits.

It's also important for Workers to have a system to convert their cash savings into another investment class. It's helpful to establish rules for this, as Workers often prefer sequential thinking and are usually great at following rules, whether they're set by themselves or by others. And once accepted, they have the discipline and tenacity to see those rules through. For example, they might have a savings account where they establish a rule that once the balance goes over $5000, then $4000 must be transferred to a predetermined and established investment. Or they might choose an investment (for example, an exchange traded fund [ETF] or managed fund) and automate a regular transfer of money to it each month.

Advanced Habits

The issue Workers have is that with the emphasis so firmly on earning, they can often neglect saving, investing and smart financial basics, such as checking in with interest rates, lodging tax returns and more. This can lead Worker Money Types to feel like frauds or ashamed—they see this as 'slack' or 'bad behaviour' so they don't seek help. It's vital for Worker Money Types to understand this is common financial behaviour for Workers and not to judge themselves so harshly that they don't seek help or set up great habits.
