He had since moved away and let his son pay a cheap rent of just £400 which was giving him a small income of £255 per month, but his plan was .for his son to one day buy the house from him

Jeremy had broken rule number one of investing – never let feelings and emotions dominate the process. He had also broken rule number two – .don’t try to kill two birds with one stone when investing

Jeremy never really bought the property as an investment, he bought it for his son to have a cheap place to live and hoped his son would save up and buy it. However, since his son moved out, Jeremy was now left with an empty property that was costing him £145 per month with the mortgage payments and he was terrified that the house would attract squatters. Jeremy was adamant that he didn’t want to be a landlord because he lived too far away to manage the property so the only thing left to do was to sell the .property

The first thing I advised Jeremy to do was to rent it out, but he was adamant he didn’t want to. I tried to persuade him. I explained how he could easily get £550 rent and he could employ the services of a local property manager who could find a tenant within two weeks. I kept pushing until Jeremy was almost red in the face with anger stating, “I do not want to be a landlord.” Some investors would say I was a fool to do this, because Jeremy may have listened to my advice and I could have lost a sale, but my number one .priority is to add value, not get the deal

After having the property on the market for eight weeks, Jeremy had had one viewing, two no-shows, three cancellations and no offers. He was very
