2. In general, there is no issue with having a conservative portfolio, but the fact that we are not optimally utilizing the biggest lever that we have for wealth creation i.e. RoI from our Investments (Refer earlier Section – Four levers of Wealth Creation). This portfolio of 2014 is giving me a poor RoI.
3. Looking at this chart for 2014, I took serious action throughout 2015, and if you look at my improved portfolio mix in 2015 (Fig 7.16B), you will realise that the equity portion (Stocks + Mutual Funds) has gone up from 17% to 30%. Now, let me tell you that this change from 17% to 30% does not happen without massive action to alter the portfolio towards equity. There were large Mutual Fund SIPs I had to start in early 2015 to reach this stage. What made me take such a 'massive' action? It was only because I was tracking my portfolio regularly through such charts, else everything gets hidden behind the humungous data that gets created with increasing wealth.
4. The debt portion of my portfolio in 2014 was extraordinarily high. Look at the % of money lying in FDs and PF (almost 66%). Although, this is fine for the first 18–24 months of your journey, you need to start taking more risks and balance your portfolio, as you go along.
5. In 2014, the commodities (gold in this case) portion was significantly lower than the general thumb rule of 5–10%. This was also improved in 2015.
6. The portfolio for 2015 is still not adequately aligned as per my age and risk profile. Sustained deliberate efforts are required to be continued for another 1–2 years to bring it closer to my age and risk profile, therefore giving me the optimal RoI, stability and liquidity on the way.

This kind of dashboard view, therefore, gives me a real time perspective of my current portfolio allocation and therefore helps me in future alignment and adjustment of my portfolio. As an example, I should continue to look for "attractive stocks" which generate good dividends and re-allocate some of the money maturing out of the next FD into one of those stocks, thus balancing my portfolio further.
