Step #6: Choose where to invest

Step #7: Buy your shares

And then we'll wrap it up with the five most common mistakes of beginner investors and how to avoid them. Let's go!

Step #1: Unlearn those money mindsets

The mindset of someone who is privileged is completely different to the mindset of someone who is just trying to survive. If you are in the 'survive' category, this is going to be a much bigger uphill battle. You may be struggling with money or financial abuse trauma, or have neurodivergent tendencies — there can be a range of factors that affect how you interact with money. Our mind and how we are able to process things plays a huge impact on our ability to grow our wealth. For some of us it may just be a case of unlearning poor money habits we learnt from our parents, while for others it's much deeper.

If that is the case, you're dealing with a different set of hurdles and it may be worth exploring this further with therapy or professional help. I've heard stories of people saying budgeting and saving was a never-ending nightmare for them until they went to therapy and uncovered much deeper-rooted reasons for their behaviour.

The next step is unlearning the idea that we are just bad with money. An investor in training has a growth mindset; they understand that they are a sponge and are picking up information and refining their investing style.

Money doesn't have to be associated with greed. Money just makes a greedy person greedier.

Instead, money should be viewed as a key that unlocks your ability to do more of what you love, and do it on your own time.

Journaling is usually one of the best ways to unlearn and understand money mindsets. A few journal prompts to ask yourself include:

- What would I do if I had 40 extra hours a week? Would I use them to work more? If not, where would I prefer to allocate my time, and why?
