you a boost of positivity, and make you feel rewarded for your hard work – and saving is hard work!

Saving for retirement

Pensions or retirement savings, with their indecipherable jargon and lack of immediate usefulness, risk becoming an abstract, far-away concept that we ignore until it suddenly feels too late to do anything about and we're at panic station. It makes sense, after all – for Millennials and Gen-Zs, there are many other intimidating financial milestones to conquer before we feel we can start prioritizing a pension (see: saving for a house). And yet, that nagging sense that we should be putting something towards our retirement worries at the back of our minds, eroding our sense of financial security and well-being and stopping us from being able to imagine our future beyond our working years.

Of course, getting and subsequently paying off a mortgage will have a significant effect on your comfort in retirement, because accommodation, whether this is rent or mortgage payments, represents a huge proportion of most people's monthly outgoings. For this reason, lots of people find that housing security and getting on to the property ladder is priority number one, and a focus on pension savings comes later, which is completely sensible – all I want you to do is make sure that your pension is a consideration. Ensuring that you're enrolled in your workplace pension and contributing