All the respondents currently owned and managed their own businesses or had recently retired after selling a business. All except Mr. Andrews, who was sixty-two, were in their mid-sixties to late seventies. After the respondents briefly introduced themselves, they discussed their financial goals. The first to respond was Mr. Andrews:

> Being in business for myself… When I wake up, every day is a challenge…. I plan my work … work my plan. It's why my business is a good one.

Mr. Andrews discussed his current gift giving and how his wealth would be distributed in the future:

> I have a son-in-law who is a physician…. Another is an attorney. They are well-off [high-income generators]. They are both in the highest tax brackets…. They don't need my money.
>
> But their wives, my girls … my daughters, do. They are spenders…. Of course, I have always spoiled them rotten, and I'm paying for it now…. They call and ask me to pay for their kids' pianos and I buy pianos…. Bicycles and birthday parties … I pay for them, too. I enjoy giving them money.
>
> My daughters are the beneficiaries of all my life insurance policies, more than enough to take care of all my estate's taxes and expenses. The girls are left with the balance.
>
> After I am gone, it makes no difference to me how they dispose of my money…. [They] can keep it, shoot craps with it, … but I just want them to be happy.

"Happy" to Mr. Andrews means having money to spend. And pride is having daughters who are married to high-income generators. He spoke repeatedly about these issues.

Seated next to Mr. Andrews was Mr. Russell, a very wealthy retired gentleman who had recently sold his manufacturing business. Immediately following Mr. Andrews's admission that he spoiled his
