course they will very passionately tell you why you should stay away. However, it's important to be able to separate fact from myth.

An investor in training listens to these myths and chooses to do their own research to understand what to take on and what to avoid.

This chapter will break down the most common myths about the stock market so that you are well equipped to focus on how to invest, instead of wasting time worrying about what could go wrong. These myths are the following:

1. you'll lose all your money investing in the stock market
2. investing is like gambling
3. investing is complicated
4. you need a lot of money to get started
5. real estate investing is less risky.

Investors in training know that if you invest with the right strategy, it can be harder to 'lose it all'. Knowing the best and worst case scenarios puts an investor in training's mind at ease, and allows them to instead dedicate their time to doing what is important: setting up investments for the long term and being able to sleep easy at night knowing they're aligned with their values and goals.

Let's break down these myths.

Myth #1: You'll lose all your money investing in the stock market

This is the biggest stock market myth. If you've been scared off by it, you're not alone; even the most experienced investors wondered about this before they began, and it was a concern I had myself. After all, you work hard every day in your job or business — do you really want to risk losing all that hard-earned money?

You'd never light $100 on fire, so why risk it with the stock market?
