1. Strengths

A business's strengths are its internal assets and capabilities that provide a competitive edge in the market. Key areas to evaluate include.

What do you do well?

This question focuses on identifying the areas in which your business outperforms. It could include aspects such as exceptional customer service, high-quality products or services, innovative solutions, a strong brand reputation, or effective marketing strategies.

What unique resources can you draw on?

This question focuses on identifying the unique assets or resources your business possesses that set it apart from competitors, such as technology, exclusive partnerships, prime locations, or intellectual property.

What do others see as your strengths?

This question involves gathering feedback from customers, partners, suppliers, and industry experts to understand how they perceive your business's strengths.

2. Weakness

These are the internal factors that may block a business's ability to achieve its objectives or compete effectively in the market. It includes

What could you improve?	Identify areas where you have areas for improvement. It could include aspects such as operational inefficiencies, outdated technology, a lack of employee training programs, poor customer service, or ineffective marketing strategies.
Where do you have fewer resources than others?	Identify areas where your business has few resources compared to competitors. These could be tangible resources like financial capital, physical assets, or access to key distribution channels.
What are others likely to see as weaknesses?	Gather feedback from sources such as customer complaints, negative reviews, competitive analysis, or industry reports.