'There's such an advice gap when it comes to money,' she says. 'Traditional financial advice serves so few people, and it's hugely product focussed. It's not about education, because a financial advisor will take action on behalf of their client. The business model of financial advice means that it's not worth a financial advisor's time to advise people controlling a regular amount of money. The people who are served are the people who already have wealth to manage, as opposed to people who are looking to manage their money better and build a comfortable level of wealth from scratch.

'So, we need something to bridge that advice gap, and that is where financial coaching comes in. Most people have had no financial education, and have just picked up bank accounts, credit cards and financial habits almost by osmosis as they've grown up. They don't have the information that they need to make informed and considered decisions. Coaching is a lot about the emotions, and helping people to ask themselves the questions that they need to ask themselves about how they relate to money – it's not about solving problems for them, but giving them the tools and information to solve those problems themselves. People need and want guidance – a clear path to follow, rather than having to cruise the internet looking for answers.'

I asked her about the most common issues that she sees as a financial coach, and she told me, 'It's mostly really simple things. Most people need help and support to organize and manage their finances on a practical level. It might be that their
