dinner, Father returned home with his par-ents, heading back to college Monday morning.

To Father,Stanford was spectacular. Warm, beautiful, laid-back, prestigious, he felt more comfortable at Stanford than at Cal or pretty much any- where else. Upon graduating at twenty, and still insecure but feeling safe at Stanford, he remained in the then brand-new first class of the Stanford Graduate School of Business, again secretly underwritten by Aunt Cary. Father never knew about Cary's financial largesse on his behalf. Multiple other family members knew. Cary and my grandfather believed it was bet-ter if the beneficiary of the largesse thought it came from a father who earned his savings rather than from a rich aunt who married money.

Stanford didn't then have an investment class as it does now; but as Father has described in other writings, there was then a class that traveled to visit and analyze local businesses. Father had a car and volunteered to drive the professor, Boris Emmett; so they spent a lot of time together, which had a profound effect on Father. He felt he learned more from those car rides with Emmett than from all of his other time at Stanford combined. He described all that better than I could in his 1980 Financial Analysts Research Foundation (FAF) monograph, “Developing an Investment Philosophy,” and so I won't tread there. In his original preface to Common Stocks and Uncommon Profits, he described his early business years, so I won't tread that turf either.
