Last week (well, last Barefoot Money Meal), you celebrated with your teen as they scored their first job.

Nice one!

Can you remember your first job?

Don’t you wish someone had sat down and explained how that pesky line item on your payslip called ‘superannuation’ worked? (And if they did, don’t you wish you’d actually listened to them?!)

Well, this Money Meal could be the most important financial conversation you ever have with your kids.

Granted, the chapter title has stolen a bit of my thunder, but in this Money Meal I’m going to step out how I gave my own twin nephews a $453 329 gift. And how your teen can get the same.

Even better, I’m going to explain exactly how you can communicate this to your teen so they not only understand it but act on it.

How can I be so sure?

Because I’ve stepped it all out for them, and for you. It couldn’t be easier.

Oh, you want it even easier?

Okay, so how about if I share with you the specific high-growth, ultra-low-cost super funds that old Uncle Scott has found . . . which will potentially boost their nest egg by hundreds of thousands of dollars over their working lives.

Sound good?

Look, most things you read don’t matter (especially if you’re reading them on Facebook or Instagram). Yet the next few pages matter a whole lot. And if you take the advice I’m about to give you, your teen, unlike the majority of people, won’t have regrets. Because of you, they WILL get it right the first time.

What you’re about to do will keep them safe and secure long after you’re gone.
