what, the coat looks gorgeous on you! Get it. You'll make the money up later."

This is where she says she discovered how profound the Millionaire Mind Intensive is. Almost as soon as her mind suggested that she buy the coat, her new and more supportive mind "file" came up and said, "You'd be much better off putting that four hundred dollars toward your FFA account! What do you need this coat for? You already have a winter coat that's okay for now."

Before she knew it, she was putting the coat on hold until the next day instead of buying it right there in the moment as usual. She never went back to get the coat.

Natalie realized that her mental "material gratification" files had been replaced with "financial freedom" files. She wasn't programmed to spend anymore. She now knows it's fine to take the best of what her parents modeled for her and save money, and at the same time, to treat herself to nice things with her play account.

Natalie then sent her parents to the course so they could be more balanced as well. She's thrilled to report, they now stay in motels (not hotels yet), they bought a new car, and in learning how to make their money work for them, they've retired as millionaires.

Natalie now understands that she doesn't have to be as "cheap" as her parents were to become a millionaire. But she also knows that if she spends her money unconsciously as before, she'll never be financially free. Natalie said, "It feels amazing to have my money and my mind under control."

Again, the idea is to have your money work as hard for you as you do for it, and that means you have to save and invest rather than make it your mission in life to spend it all. It's almost funny: rich people have a lot of money and spend a little, while poor people have a little money and spend a lot.

Long-term versus short-term: poor people work to earn money to live today; rich people work to earn money to pay for their investments, which will pay for their future.

Rich people buy assets, things that will likely go up in value. Poor people buy expenses, things that will definitely go down in value. Rich people collect land. Poor people collect bills.

I'll tell you the same thing I tell my kids: "Buy real estate." It's best if you can purchase property that can produce positive cash flow, but as far as I'm concerned, any real estate is better than no real estate. Sure, real estate has its ups and downs, but in the end, be it five, ten, twenty, or
