4. Service Distribution Models

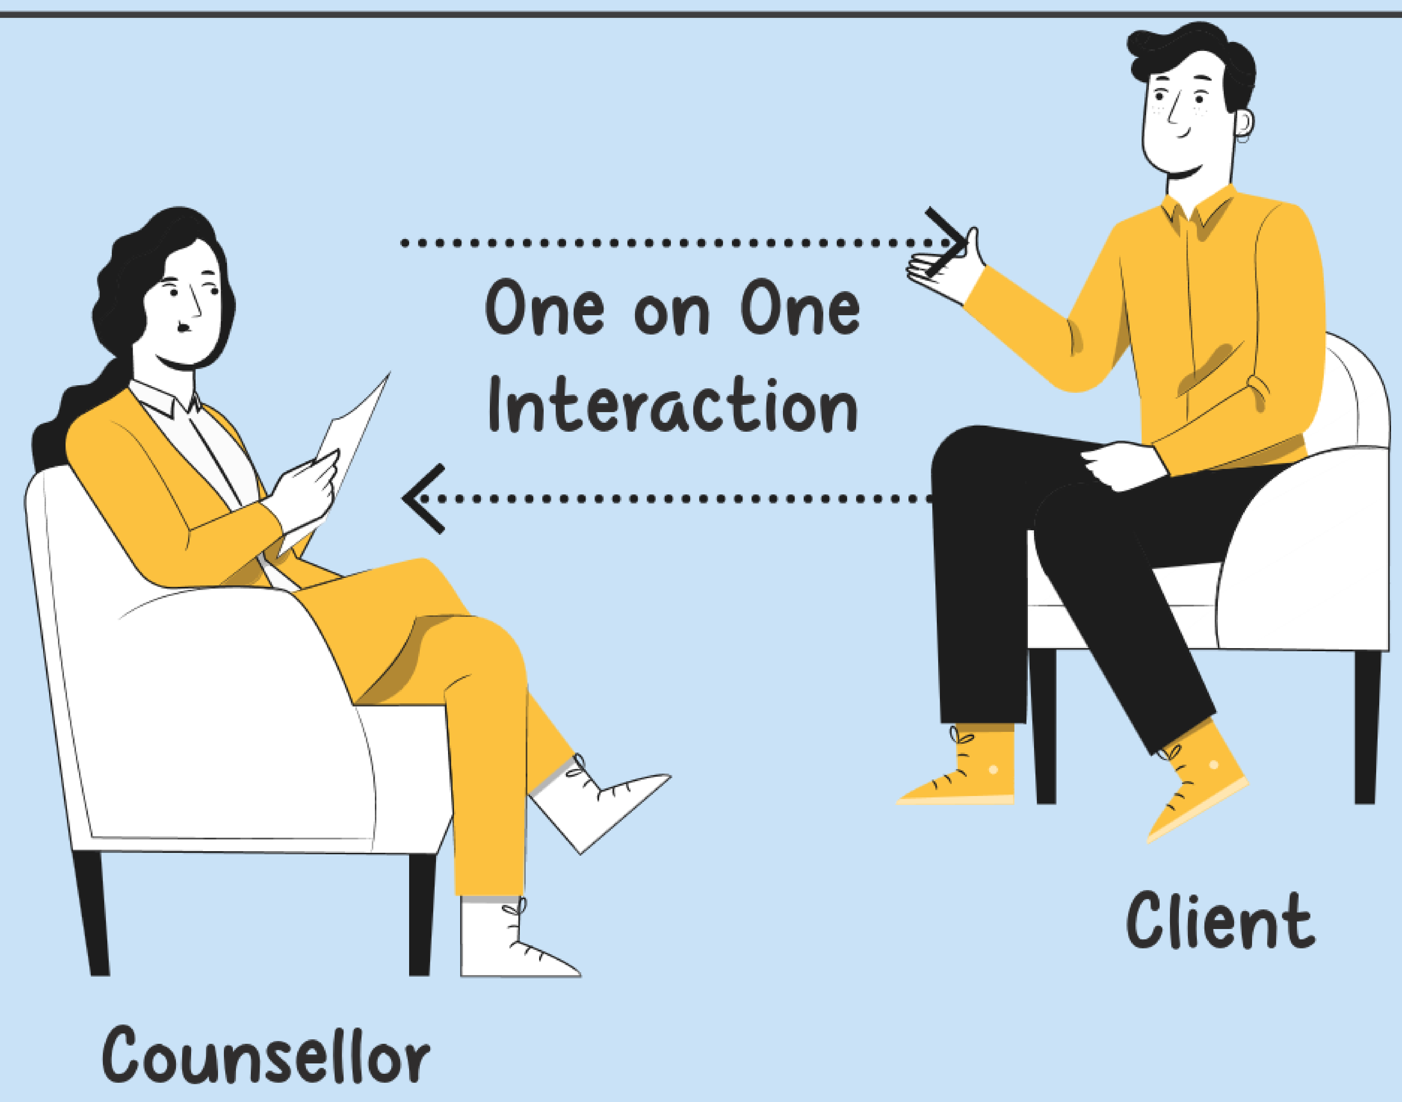
Direct-to-Consumer (D2C) Model

Companies provide their services directly to consumers without involving intermediaries or service aggregators.

A. Direct Client Engagement

Direct client engagement provides personalised services directly to clients without the involvement of intermediaries or third-party platforms. Businesses engage with clients by interacting on a one-on-one basis and creating solutions that meet their needs and preferences.

For example, in the case of a counselling session, a counsellor (who runs an independent practice) engages directly with their client to provide personalised guidance tailored to the client's individual preferences. This develops trust and understanding between the business and the client.



B. Subscription Model

Businesses offer their services to clients in exchange for subscription fees. Clients pay a regular subscription to get access to the services provided by the businesses for a specific time.

For example, in the case of chartered accountant (CA) consulting, a client may subscribe to receive accounting services from a chartered accountant in exchange for a monthly or annual subscription fee to retain access.
