> investments.
>
> So my discovery in investing, and advice to younger ones who would endeavor to, [sic] is to study markets and invest in long term enterprises which have the potential to vastly outpace other companies and industries and stick with them as long as the theme is intact. Forget about the trading and use the time you would have spent monitoring the trade with your family.
>
> It seems so simple, but few actually ever achieve it.
>
> Here is a prime example of what I am talking about: Back in January 1992 I read the Barron's Roundtable and Felix Zulauf recommended Potash of Saskatchewan (POT) as a unique way to play the China growth story. … It all made sense to me so I took a modest position.
>
> The stock did quite well, I recall I bought it for $2/share. I held onto it for 3 years and got a 4–5 bagger out of it. I was pretty impressed with myself at my acute market acumen. It stalled out eventually and I sold it around 1996 as I got tired of it treading water. Now mind you the original premise never changed, it was always intact, yet I craved new action.
>
> If I had held on until the blow off in 2007 I would have had my 100-bagger. If one had bought even earlier it was a 200+ bagger.
>
> So the lesson is one needs to stick to the original theme and if it is intact just hold on. I believe your project is in fact a very achievable objective. One needs to isolate the common threads and place one's bets on the table after much research and conviction then hold on.

That's a good story, from someone who has won his wisdom the hard way. He hits on many important themes in this book. I'm going to have my 16-year-old son and my 13-year-old daughter read it, so they'll know it's not just Dad saying this stuff.

Here's another email:

> I remember as a kid my dad used to grumble about my grandmother because she would complain that she couldn't see well and she had cataracts. He would say, well she doesn't seem to