tendency to run multiple strategies and to want to have plan A as well as backup plans B, C, D, E and F has been incredibly helpful within my businesses. It came in handy when we were having delays with starting a new long-day preschool at Thinkers.inq because it meant we could launch into another income-generating strategy rather than simply panicking because our timelines were delayed.

I apply this same strategic thinking to my investment decisions. I'll often run spreadsheets for my personal investments and my businesses that aren't necessarily super-detailed, but I'll revisit them regularly to make sure my thinking is right. My major investments are in business, then property and finally shares. I own my own home and feel comfortable with this because it's convenient and the tax laws make it worthwhile, so it's a rational rather than an emotional purchase. My most recent purchase is a CBD-based apartment that's also a second home—interestingly, because this was as much an emotional decision as an investment one, it took me almost four years to commit and I found the process incredibly difficult. While I invest in property because it makes sense to have some exposure, I'm more interested in developing business income streams and trading in shares through the share market.

When it comes to investing, I'm influenced by the thinking of smart people I respect. For example, I respect Olivia Engel's methodology at State Street Global Advisors and follow economists I admire on Twitter and through investment briefings. While I already believe in the logic of passive investing, the fact that Warren Buffett, whom I admire as an incredibly smart investor, said that when he passed away his estate should sell his fund and invest in a passive index fund (he's specifically nominated the S&P500), means I feel validated in my thinking. However, personally I invest in and trade shares directly because I believe I can beat the index.

I'm not an idealist and I can be very judgemental—of myself as much as of anyone else. But I'm comfortable in my own ideas and plans and I'm willing to back myself financially when I feel they're right.

I can be erratic in my spending, saving and investing due to my lack of consistency (a Discerner weakness mentioned above). I find having strong boundaries, not having my savings readily accessible in cash, maintaining one allocated spending bank account and creating logical rules around my spending and saving help to maintain some discipline and consistency. Some of these spending rules involve choosing everyday frugality, which means
