> One optimistic note was sounded by Salomon Brothers' asset allocation committee, led by chief economist Henry Kaufman, which predicted Thursday that the global bull market will continue into 1988 following recent corrections. Kaufman's outlook includes rising interest rates and mounting inflation risks as economic growth accelerates. Better than anticipated corporate earnings will overcome the drag from rising interest rates.

Burnham Lambert's bulletin of October 19, the very morning of the Crash, dismissed recent downturns as "a dramatic overreaction to poor trade data" and confidently asserted that "economic conditions are good . . . the acceleration in profit growth has just begun." Here was another signal pointing to the certainty of big trouble ahead.

If only one had bothered to read the recent newsletters from my old friend the market astrologer, Arch Crawford, whose predictions I had continued to ignore. In the aftermath of Black Monday I read in a Dick Davis financial column entitled "Some Market Analysts Saw the Crash Coming":

> Using a combination of technical, fundamental and astrological factors, Arch Crawford's The Crawford Perspectives from New York has made some uncanny market calls. In early August, he said, "Our long-term sell signal is set in stone. Be out of all stocks by August 24th, from which point we expect a horrendous Crash." August 24th marked the Dow high of 2,722. Crawford remains pessimistic . . .

Too late, I've decided to take Crawford's advice. My wife and I have resolved never again to invest in stocks, a resolve which probably will last until too late in the next bull phase, by which time we will doubtless have engaged a promising new stockbroker.
