The granddaddy of kids' savings accounts is the Bankwest Kids' Bonus Saver, which pays a whopping 4.75 per cent per annum. So naturally there's a catch. Actually, catches. First, you'll need to set up two accounts. Second, if you miss a deposit you earn . . . 0.01 per cent. Third, after 12 months your money is automatically swept over to an account which pays just 0.75 per cent for amounts under $3000. Clear as mud, right?

Should I use my kids' online savings accounts to save long term for their education?

No—don't save money long term (as in 10 years) in these accounts; that's not their purpose.

Later in the book I'll show you exactly where I personally invest for my kids, and a little strategy I call the Barefoot Ladder Fund.

Should I still pay for my kids' purchases on iTunes or Google Play?

No—it's time to close your digital wallet. Now that all your kids have jam jars or bank accounts, if they want to buy stuff online they can buy a gift card (iTunes, or Google Play) from the supermarket (or pay you back from their jars).

The first payday!

Tonight you're going to tackle two hugely important things in one Money Meal.
