

my dad was a different person. He'd be happy, kind, and extremely generous. He'd come over and ask me if I needed a few bucks. I felt like giving him his glare back, but I wasn't that stupid so I just said, "Sure, Dad, thanks," and rolled my eyes.

Life was good...until that dreaded day when he'd come home and announce, "I found a good piece of land. We're going to build again." I distinctly remember saying, "Great, Dad, good luck," as my heart sank, knowing the struggle that was about to unfold again.

This pattern lasted from the time I could remember, when I was about six, until the age of twenty-one,
