

when I moved out of my parents' house for good. Then it stopped, or so I thought.

At twenty-one years of age, I finished school and became, you guessed it, a builder. I then went on to several other types of project-based businesses. For some strange reason, I'd make a small fortune, but just a short time later, I'd be broke. I'd get into another business and believe I was on top of the world again, only to hit bottom a year later.

This up-and-down pattern went on for nearly ten years before I realized that maybe the problem wasn't the type of business I was choosing, the partners I was
