

We were in the trade, and the price had not yet started moving to the downside. I warned him regarding his risk amount as it was a pure option buy, and if we don't get a fall in Nifty, he will lose the entire risk amount (as it was also a monthly expiry).

He told me that he was aware of the risk and might plan to exit soon if he gets some profits.

Suddenly, Nifty started to fall after 10 AM and our Put Option premium started increasing. My friend closed the trade with 1:2 profits.

He was happy because he took a significant risk on that day and made 100% profit. He logged out from the system to avoid taking any unnecessary trades.

But Nifty started falling more (after 10.30-11 AM), and my profits were fluctuating up and down drastically. But even though I had a short view of Nifty, I didn't think it would fall very much.

Later, the surgical strike news came out in the media, and I realized that this was the reason for the significant fall in Nifty. Luck was also there on my side as the system indicated a short trade on that day which was also the monthly expiry day, and news came out after I took a short position.

I thought I was born intelligent and started closing some of my short positions whenever Nifty fell by some points. By 12 PM, I had closed most of my positions, and retained only a small quantity of my short position. I had decided to carry it till EOD.

I didn't feel like having lunch on that day and ended up watching the complete price action.

Finally, the market closed.

I had bought put options at 1.5, and my average closing price was around 51. I ended up making my career-best profits on that day, and all the people
