

But after experiencing such a miserable day, I decided to take up the 10-days intense Vipassana program, which I had postponed for a few years.

I was unsure whether I wanted to know the reasons for my misery or I wanted to improve as a day trader, but decided to complete the program no matter what happened. With a lot of struggle I reached the 9th day of the program.

On the 9th day, all the meditation sessions went smoothly till the afternoon. Then I saw a queue line-up to collect mobiles and essential belongings. Somehow I didn't get the urge to collect them. Besides, I was reluctant to give up the bliss which I had gathered in the last eight days.

By evening, we were allowed to speak with each other (in the Vipassana program, people were supposed to maintain a vow of silence till 9th day evening), and I saw a small gathering near the pagoda. I stood there and slowly started speaking with them.

When I introduced myself to the group, one person shouted back immediately, 'Wow, there is one more stock market trader here!'

I said – 'Are you serious?'

He said – 'Yes, I spoke with him a few minutes back; he is fair and wearing a white kurta.'

I replied – 'Ok, let me check.'

I roamed around the complete campus, but I didn't find any fair guy wearing a white kurta.

The next day, I saw him, and we spoke for some time. I was shocked when I realized that only last week he had quit his job to pursue full-time day trading, and had come to the program with his newly wedded wife!

After some time, we met again in a clearing queue of the program, and he introduced his wife to me. Both were young, adorable, and a happy couple. At that moment, I decided to help them (if not to make money, at least not to lose a significant amount in day trading).

A few days after the completion of the program, they invited me to their house. They were early risers like me; so one fine day I went to their home for breakfast. After breakfast, he started explaining his trading system,
