

If you are a beginner, I suggest exploring all types of trading – scalping, day trading, positional trading, and investment. Once you understand how they work, pick any trading type which complements your mindset and is easy to manage for you.

5 – Lack of Patience

I've been an impatient personality for as long as I can remember. But the market taught many things, and one paramount quality it did, is 'patience.'

People think 2-3 years is too long term to learn intraday trading. But they will spend 30-40 years in a job and stay broke their whole life.

They want to learn trading in a jiffy and don't have patience to learn all the trading tricks. They assume day trading demands less skill and requires only a few minutes to manage the trades.

But if a person doesn't have enough patience, then he can't survive here. It doesn't matter how much passion or energy you have; if you don't have patience, you're going to burn out soon in day trading!

Always remember - Rome wasn't built in a day, but Rome was built every day!

People Aren't Actually "Day Trading", They Are Just Gambling!

One day I received a call from a middle-aged person. He introduced himself and wanted to know whether it is possible to make money in intraday trading.

I informed him that it depends on the individual, his desire for the market, and how he executes his trades. Besides, I also started explaining how money management and trading psychology play a crucial role in day trading.

But within 2 minutes, he stopped my explanation abruptly and said, 'I know intraday trading, and I am doing it for 20 years now'.

His sudden rude response indicated three things –
