

TAKEAWAYS

- ° Have these hard conversations. Sort out your family's and your own financial shit before you're dealing with possible trauma and grief. Making long-lasting money decisions during an emotional time is not ideal. The more you have planned out, the less likely you are to cause deep familial resentments or make rash choices people are unhappy with.
- ° If there is a risk of your losing a family member anytime soon, research exactly what you'll have to take care of after that person dies and what you can leave by the wayside. There's no sense in doing or paying more than you have to during this difficult time.
- ° Think about your own posthumous financial trail. It's something no one wants to do, but the real gift is making sure everyone is taken care of before it's too late.
