

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

First, I thank Nona Willis Aronowitz, the wonderful editor who kicked all this off with my viral “Get Rich or Die Vlogging” piece, made infinitely better by her notes. My research assistant, Emily Parsons, did a lot of grunt work with a smile. My Bad with Money producers Sam Dingman and Lindsey Kradowill are both saints; the podcast is theirs as much as it is mine. Further research was conducted by Paul Haynes and Jill Gutowitz, who transcribed and listened to my voice more than anyone would want to.

I thank my editors Daniella Wexler and Haley Weaver, and my team and cheerleaders Matt Sadeghian, Chloe Pisello, and Sasha Raskin.

I thank Jess Aceves and the students of Gage Park High School, Sallie Middleton and the students of Palm Beach State College, and Maggie Sherman and the students of Plantation High School. I watched Stevie Boebi’s video on homeless youth and read posts by Talia Jane while writing this book, and they provided much needed perspective.

I thank Marc and Caryn Dunn for their patience and honesty. What a wild ride we’ve all been on. I love you both. I thank Cheyanne Dunn for her contributions to the book and my life. I’d be remiss if I didn’t mention the queen herself: Meme, who taught me to be unapologetic and a necessary amount of selfish. Meme passed away during the editing of this book and I am thankful I got to interview her for it before then. Her story deserves to be told.

I thank Allison Raskin for always pushing me to be better. Suh dude.

I also thank my therapist, The L Word, and Law and Order SVU for their support during the writing of this book. Everyone else mentioned in a positive light in this book, thank you for your contributions. And thank you to the LGBTQ community for always caring about what I’m up to. I do pretty much everything to make you all proud.
