

Will you do enough in the short time you have to prepare your kids?

And will your kids leave with the financial confidence and the street smarts to seize the opportunities the world has to offer them?

Well, the reality is that young people aged between 18 and 24 have the lowest levels of financial literacy of any age group, according to ASIC research.

In other words—if your kid is normal, they are not prepared.

Normal is $4200 in credit card debt.

Normal is making only the minimum repayments, which will take them 42 years to pay off, with a whopping $21 080 in interest.

Normal is accepting the bank's offer for an increased credit card limit . . .
Oh, okay, sure, and a loan for a new car.

Normal is working a job they've outgrown so they can continue making repayments on stuff they regret buying.

The bottom line is this: as a parent, the days are long, but the years are quick . . .

And you only have a very short time to influence your kids.

Because once they turn 18, you have to share that influence—with their friends, with their bank, with their Instagram account, with their boss.

And most of these people don't have your kids' best interests at heart . . .
but you do.

What really makes the difference?

Have you ever wondered what really makes the difference—why some kids fly and others seem to flail?

Is it having wealthy, educated, upper-middle-class parents?

Is it attending a $35 000-a-year private school you mortgaged your kidney to get them into?
