

Today's teens have grown up with the internet . . . and therefore continuous advertising.

These days ads aren't the 30-second spots in between the content—in many cases they're integrated into the content.

So . . . how do we fight it?

How about blocking your kids' access to advertising?

Or limiting their screen time?

Good luck with that.

Besides, the New York Times' Hilary Stout says the iPhone is the 'most effective tool in human history to mollify a fussy toddler'.

(In fact, in 2018 two of the largest investors in Apple urged the company to address smartphone addiction among kids . . . I presume to guard against future lawsuits.)

According to Ad Age, marketers spent one trillion dollars globally in 2017.

That's $1 000 000 000 000 on messaging. And (thanks to Mark Zuckerberg) they're micro-targeting their messages based on the fears and insecurities that our kids—and all of us—have typed into their search bars.

Bottom line?

You're fighting an uphill battle trying to keep your kid 'ad free'.

However, there is something that is infinitely more powerful than Google's algorithm:

You.

Show them how to 'adult'

If you're not doing it already, it's time to give your kids a seat at the big people's table so they can watch you in action 'adulting'.
