

So this Money Meal, we're going to do a Family Treasure Hunt and sell some of their old stuff!

Now, even though the average household has $5400 of unwanted stuff they could sell, this is not simply a revenue-raising exercise. Rather, it's an opportunity to strip back the marketing spin and get your kids to look at something after it's been unboxed, used and discarded.

Here's how the Family Treasure Hunt works

At the next Money Meal, you'll encourage your kids to choose an item they no longer use (preferably one they once bugged the hell out of you for—like the guitar they had to have after going to that Ed Sheeran concert).

You'll start a timer for two minutes . . . and get them to go and find that one thing and bring it back to the table before the timer runs out.

This exercise alone will get them thinking about how much stuff they no longer use. And it serves as your conversation over dinner (like why Dad bought the Ab King Pro off an infomercial late one night while he sat on the couch eating chips).

Then, over the next week, you'll do the following:

Step 1: Figure out how much it cost brand new

If you can't remember, look it up. And for bonus points, try to find an ad selling the product on the web or on YouTube, and watch it and explain to your kids how the marketers have dressed it up.

Step 2: Sell it!

I don't care if you do it via Gumtree, eBay, Facebook's Buy, Swap and Sell, or a garage sale . . . this is something you should all do together. Get onto
