

Once everyone's finished eating (but before dessert), announce: 'We're going on a Treasure Hunt! You have two minutes to pick something you don't use anymore . . . and we'll trade it for something you do want.'

Set your phone timer to two minutes, then get them to rush around and find that one thing and bring it back to the table. You get your Ab King Pro (or other unused item).

Explain to them that, over the next week, you're all going to complete the following three simple steps:

Step 1: Figure out how much it cost brand new.

Step 2: Research what it's worth second-hand—and sell it.

Step 3: Buy something you want second-hand—and figure out how much you've saved!

DESSERT:

Do payday (three minutes is all it takes!).

Everyone pitches in and does the dishes.

Then flop on the couch, flick on the telly and play Flogglebox (see page).

Pester power be gone!

You should be really proud of yourself.

You have created a childhood experience that your kids will remember, and tell their kids about. But it's much more than that.

See, most of the deep-seated money problems I help people with might have been avoided by their parents just sitting down at the dinner table for a few minutes a week and modelling good behaviours.
