

makes you want more stuff.

I really believe the experience has taught our kids to be conscious consumers—to think about whether they really need or want things, or whether the money would be better saved for the future.