

I have friends who take photos of their home-cooked creations and upload them to Instagram (#nokids).

Yet let's be honest for a second: if you've got kids, sometimes dinner . . . is a shiitake show.

Well, in this chapter we'll chop up a way to not only get your kids to cook you dinner . . . but have them actually enjoy the process.

You know that TV show Survivor?

We're going to play our own reality game: your kids will be dispatched with $30 and sent off to the supermarket to get supplies, so they can survive in the wilds of suburbia. It's the ultimate survival strategy for departing teens.

You know that show The Bachelor?

Bugger the rose ceremony, I'll teach your kids how to become marriage material (including the recipe that won over my wife).

Oh, and because I'm more finance than foodie, I've passed the potato peeler to one of the best cooks I know, who'll stop by to teach your kids two simple recipes.

By the time you've finished this chapter, your kids will have 'learned to cook at least two low-cost, delicious, nutritious meals from scratch', which is the third challenge of the Barefoot Ten.

For now, though, let me tell you about the hidden cost of Uber Eats.

The hidden cost of Uber Eats

When I was growing up my mum did a 'big shop' once a fortnight.

My sister and I would perch ourselves on the kitchen bench and eagerly watch Mum pull groceries out of the shopping bags like she was some supermarket Santa.

Yet, excited as we were, we knew we couldn't immediately scoff all the Scotch Fingers, because it would be two looooong weeks before Santa
