

came again.

Back then, supermarket shopping was a total haemorrhoid: there were no 24/7 supermarkets, no Sunday trading, and takeaway was really only for Friday or Saturday night—if we were lucky. (And restaurants were reserved for special occasions, like birthdays with zeroes on the end of them.)

And that's why Mum made each meal stretch:

Monday: Lamb roast (and, as we've discussed, she'd recycle the fat).

Tuesday: Lamb sangers in my lunchbox.

Wednesday: Cold lamb and three veg for dinner.

Today that's all changed.

We can now sit on the couch, thumb through Uber Eats, order our single serve, and track it all the way to the door.

It's only $25 a serve (with delivery).

And we're doing it more than ever—online takeaway food sales increased more than 50 per cent in 2017.

Australians spent $2.6 billion last year just on companies such as Uber Eats, Menulog and Deliveroo —around $1590 a year per person, according to Finder.

So, who's buying?

Kids under 30 account for almost half of all fast food purchases, and a third of restaurant trade.

True story: a mate of mine has four teenage kids, and he complained that the other night they all ordered separate single meals from Uber Eats!

Another true story: I work with a guy who's a multi-millionaire . . . and always arrives at the office with a cheese sandwich he made himself. 'No point in wasting money eating out,' he says.

Different mindset.
