

The millionaire mindset: leftover lunches

Thing is, if you're eating takeaway, it also means that there are no leftovers the next day (so that'll be another $15 on lunch . . . call it $20 with a coffee).

When you become conditioned to swiping an app, you don't see the money coming out of your wallet and you get in the habit of eating prepared food rather than cooking.

In short, if your kids don't learn how to cook before they move out, they'll waste a heap of money.

Besides, cooking has other advantages . . .

On my first date with Liz, I was very nervous. Yet I didn't take her out to some swanky restaurant. Instead, I invited her over to my place for a candlelit dinner (minus the candles), and pulled out the big guns: Scott's Famous Pasta (more on this a little later).

Liz was clearly impressed with my culinary skills.

I know that because she told me so, and because every day since that evening she's been by my side.

Though, with victory mine, it was only later she discovered that it was pretty much the only meal I could pull off.

So this Money Meal is about teaching your kids (mainly your teens) to shop for, and cook, at least two low-cost, delicious, nutritious meals from scratch.

Yet I know what you're thinking.

Here's you: Mate, you don't know anything about cooking.

Here's me: I do not disagree with you.

Case in point, back when Liz was in her final trimester with our third child.

You can just picture it: it's January, so she's hot, hormonal, cankled and cranky.

It's my job to keep the boys amused (and out of trouble) for the day.
