

BAREFOOT MONEY MEAL

THE GRANDPARENTS' DINNER PARTY

Dinner parties are a lot of fun . . . especially when you don't have to cook! Okay, so with tweens you'll definitely be controlling the cooking, and with the older ones you'll probably be supervising. (Still, you can do it with a wine in your hand.)

ENTRÉE:

Have the 'chef' set the table, and suggest they go a little fancy: put on a tablecloth, light some candles, use the posh cutlery, write place cards for seating, and play some background music.

When the grandparents arrive, get them to play the Family Legends game:

Do you know . . .

- where Grandma and Grandpa were born?
- how much they paid for groceries in their day?
- what your parents were like when they were your age?

MAIN COURSE:

Teens serve their signature dish. (And even if the food is what Gordon Ramsay would describe as 'dog s', your dinner guests will be very supportive of their first attempts at cooking.) Remember to take photos!

Congratulate the chef on feeding so many people for under $30 . . . then do a comparison. How much would the bill be if they were in a restaurant, or calling Uber Eats? $100? $150?

Remind them that they could freeze these meals, and be eating them quicker than a Deliveroo could pedal their treadly to your door, for $5 a
