

Do you remember when you were a kid, there were always those World Vision ads on telly that implored you to sponsor a kid in Africa?

Of course World Vision do amazing work, with some of the world's poorest kids, and I hold them in the highest regard. However, back in the eighties I just couldn't connect with the picture of a hungry African kid on the other side of the world taped to the fridge . . . while I stuffed my face with Cheezels.

Regardless, that didn't stop parents trying to shame their kids when they didn't eat their dinner:

'Little Makalo would love to eat your tuna casserole!'

Here's the point: it's bloody hard to get our kids to realise just how good they've got it, right?

After all, we're not only living through the wealthiest time in human history, we're living in one of the richest countries on earth.

Compared to our great-grandparents' lives, we're all Jay-Z and Beyoncé.

Yet after many years of thinking about it, I've worked out how to 'break the brat'.

This is a practical, hands-on guide to one of the most memorable challenges of the Barefoot Ten: 'Before your child leaves home, they should have volunteered in their local community'.

I'll show you how to create an instant 'family legend' that your kids will remember at your funeral.

And you'll also discover how to get your kids to appreciate how good they have it . . . in just one Money Meal.

Let's get started.

We Are the World

When I was growing up in the eighties, the biggest popstars on the planet came together to raise money for Africa with the song 'We Are the World'.
