

There's no need to start feeding the masses bread and fish like a motivated messiah. Instead, there are three things your kids can do, with you or independently, depending on their age:

Kids: The pantry giveaway

The easiest way to introduce little kids to the power of helping people is to go to your pantry and see what you can give away (or grow your own veggies, and donate them). Simply google your local Foodbank (they operate in every state), and they'll tell you what they need most and where you can deliver it.

Kids and tweens: The shopping spree

When you're next walking around the supermarket, ask your kids, 'What can we buy hungry people?'

Here's some advice from Foodbank:

Encourage your kids to bring along some money from their Give Jar so they can buy food with their own money, and then on the way home you can drop it off.

Example:

Your six-year-old daughter goes to the supermarket with you and buys tins of soup and baked beans with the money in her Give Jar.
