

On the way home you drop it off at the local Foodbank warehouse (or your local community charity that distributes food in your area. You can find their contact details from your local council).

The lady at the front desk sees you both walking in with the box of food.

She springs out of her chair, shakes your daughter's hand, and says:

'What a kind girl you are! You've helped a lot of hungry children. Thank you so much!'

Your child may remember this for the rest of her life.

Tweens and teens: Volunteer in their local community

The previous two options are great for younger kids. Yet to check off the Barefoot Ten, your kids need to 'have actually volunteered in their local community by the time they leave home'.

Thankfully, there are plenty of ways to do that. For example, your local council may have a program (like a casserole club) where you prepare and share a meal with a vulnerable member of society, such as an old person living alone.

Alternatively they could visit an aged-care home and bake a birthday cake for someone whose family is all gone—like Jack. There are literally dozens of options here, so you should get in touch with your local council or local aged-care home to see what opportunities your kids have to volunteer.

And because we've spoken about Foodbank, and because I believe in that organisation, they could also choose to work with Foodbank. Check out Foodbank's website at foodbank.org.au for more information.

Everything you wanted to know about breaking the brat in one page