

I decided I wanted my son to learn these lessons along with me.

One of the first steps was setting him up with three moneyboxes—one for saving, one for spending and one for giving—and he had to split his money into each whenever he got paid. He has now saved $1500, and he has donated many times to charity.

Perhaps the most poignant moment was the 2011 Bundaberg floods when he was six years old. He saw first-hand families and friends lose everything, and donated all he had to the relief fund. The lady over the counter made such a big deal of it when he handed over his moneybox. That moment had a huge impact on him.

Now, at 14 years old, he is saving up to go to Borneo so he can volunteer his time working in a local village. When I look at him now, I see a thoughtful, generous, kind young man—and I couldn't be prouder.
