

Imagine that I'm standing right in front of you.

I'm fanning your face with a bunch of $50 notes.

And you're wondering why I'm treating you like some exotic dancer, when I lean over and whisper to you:

'If you spend 45 minutes on the internet with me, I'll give you $540. Nothing kinky.'

And if you're a dinky-di Aussie you'll say . . . 'nah'.

That's because it's very un-Australian to be smart with your money.

Aussies pay a staggering $11.6 billion in 'lazy tax' each year by not shopping around for better deals on household expenses, according to a 2016 study by the Queensland University of Technology.

The research found that, while 50 per cent of Aussies had seriously considered switching providers, less than 25 per cent actually got off their couch, dusted the Doritos off their laps, and did something about it.
