

Truth be told, I'm as laid-back as a banana lounge, so today I'm going to show you how to be . . . even lazier?

Yes, in this chapter I'm going to help you save thousands of dollars a year without you having to lift a pinky. Even better, at the same time you'll be teaching your teens lifelong lessons that will boost their confidence.

But that's not all. In this chapter I'm also going to:

- Fight the 'lazy tax' with the moodiest, mouthiest force on the planet: your teenager.
- Show you how to get a special 'parent discount' every time you stop for petrol.
- Reveal how to save 25 per cent on your electricity bill and get your teen to use less power.

So go on, recline on your La-Z-Boy, grab a bag of Doritos bigger than your head, and chillax while I potentially save you thousands of dollars and propel you to parent of the year.

That winning feeling

Managing your money is all about confidence.

So in my last book I intentionally built up people's financial confidence by having them go on Barefoot Date Nights, and showed them how to score quick, incredibly valuable wins.

People went out and changed their bank accounts. They reviewed their super. They began investing. All with a beer in their hand.

It was a game changer for a lot of people. For perhaps the first time in their lives, they set up bank accounts that didn't suck, and they said to themselves: 'I just switched to a zero-fee, high-interest-earning bank account . . . I made a smart financial decision. This is great!'

Some hadn't had that feeling for years . . . some had never experienced it. Yet when you rebuild someone's financial confidence, amazing things
