

happen.

And it's the same for your kids.

I want your kids to have that winning feeling before they leave home. In fact, I want them to have those wins again and again, so it becomes part of their identity.

And like all good brainwashing, you can start it at a very young age.

Let me explain.

Little kids: 'Turn off the lights!'

If there's one saying that reminds me of my childhood, it's this:

'Do you think we run a power factory?'

My parents would say this over and over as they huffed around behind me switching off lights in the hall.

(Come to think of it, they really should have run a power factory—if they had they'd be loaded today.)

According to Choice, each year Australians spend $1.2 billion more than they should on power, and, despite the fact that most of our country is a giant quarry, we have some of the highest power bills on the planet.

Crazy.

Now, little kids don't really get the concept of negotiating a cheaper deal—but it's never too early to start teaching them the importance of saving money.

And if there's anything little kids love, it's to get one up on their parents (and older siblings).

So we're going to take advantage of that . . . and give them a responsibility they'll love: they can become the 'light monitor'.

Basically, it's their job to walk around and turn off the lights when they're not in use.
